

Writing the book on buying and selling auto dealerships

When John J. Pico opened his law practice in 1972, he didn't know the difference between factory car parts and industry car parts.

To him, parts were parts. But to the dealership owners he represented, it made a big difference.

He searched for a book to guide him through car dealership buy-and-sell agreements, factory relations and other related topics, without success. Finally, he decided if he wanted such a book he'd have to write it himself.

After 15 years of research, he published his two-volume book, A Practical Guide to Buying and Selling Automobile Dealerships (National Legal Publishing Company, $495), a desk manual for dealership buyers and sellers, attorneys, accountants, bankers and anyone else who is involved in the day-to-day finances and legalities of a dealership.

"I looked for years to find something to read to help guide me, but there wasn't anything that had any meat to it," says Pico, who sold his law firm in 1980 so he could devote his full attention to dealer consultation. Pico holds a law degree from Hastings College of Law, University of California, and a bachelor of arts degree from Chapman College.

Each of the two volumes has more than 400 pages. They are published in loose-leaf binders so the user can replace pages as they are annually updated. The first volume covers among other things, buyer's preparation, seller's preparation, and negotiating the contract.

The second volume includes samples of documents and forms commonly encountered while representing dealers and lenders in sales, management and workout situations as well as lender, distributor and manufacturer disputes. It contains sample documents, including a letter of intent to buy, management agreement and seller's interview sheet.

Because his book is so new, Pico says he doesn't have figures on how many have been sold, but says he has received positive feedback from dealers and other people whose business thrive on the buying and selling of vehicles and dealerships.

"It (his book) fills a void," says Pico. "One megadealer bought it and gave it to his management team. Accountants tell me they

Magazine advertising up

The automotive industry was the nation's top spender in magazine advertising in 1989 with $882.89 million — up 10.53 percent from 1988, according to the Publishers Information Bureau.

While the $69.13 million the industry spent in December 1989 was down 12.21 percent from December 1988, auto advertising spending for the fourth quarter totaled $221.5 million, up 15 percent from the 1988 quarter.

A Practical Guide to Buying and Selling Automobile Dealerships.

A NEW publication. An industry benchmark.

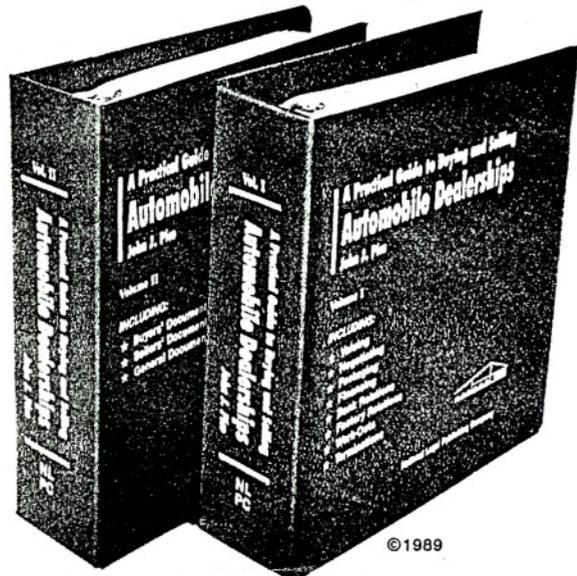

No buyer or seller, or the attorneys, accountants and bankers they work with, can any longer afford to go into negotiations without these two books. Those who are even thinking about buying or selling an automobile dealership need them, because they lay out a clear and detailed roadmap of the unforfeiting process which lies ahead.

It's written by one of the most experienced attorneys in the field, John J. Pico, who for a decade and a half has served as attorney and advisor for hundreds of automobile dealers across the nation.

Now, he has turned that unique track record into a two-volume compendium of do's and don'ts of ownership changes, and the pitfalls which lie in the path of both the buyers and sellers, and others involved in negotiations and the mechanics of conveying not only the dealership but also the physical and human assets which are involved.

This is a major new publication. Volume I, which is the narrative portion, is over 400 pages of text. Volume II contains hundreds of pages of tailor-made forms and checklists.

The total cost is $495 for both volumes. A loose-leaf format is utilized, because it is anticipated that update packages will be made available from time to time to keep the books current in a fast-changing industry.
